The context of this document appears to be a strategy document or a briefing paper related to counter-terrorism. It discusses the challenges and potential solutions for countering terrorism, both domestically and abroad. The document highlights the importance of maintaining a strong dialogue with the American people, keeping up the pressure on terrorist cells, and ensuring the reliability of intelligence information. It also mentions the use of federal, state, and local forces to seek out and destroy terrorist cells, as well as the need to address the economic, political, and military assets of those cells. The document further emphasizes the importance of working with foreign nations to improve internal security, share intelligence information, and intervene if necessary. It also touches on the role of economic leaders with charismatic qualities and the need to develop new political, economic, religious, and social campaigns to counter terrorism. The document concludes with a call to come up with innovative methods to harden the target, make every citizen an asset of the war on terror, and encourage development of new weapons programs. The document includes references to other sections or parts of the document for further reading and information.
